Students who are thrilled to do their homework every single day are rare. Everyone needs a motivational push now and then, even as adults. Allow me to share some tips I have found that have proved useful in becoming more motivated in school.

1. Change your perspective

What you learn in school builds the foundation for your future knowledge and skills—no matter if you have plans are vocational or collegiate. The purpose of education is to give the student exposure to a wide variety of topics—some of which will not make a connection until much later. At a young age, it is difficult to see the connections of lessons learned in math, language arts, science, and other subjects. These are the building blocks for success in future learning.

2. Become an “expert” in one area

There isn't a student who absolutely loves all subjects. All you need to do is focus a bit more on the area you love and get some serious attitude about it. Research deeper, become more involved and enjoy your devotion to the things that interest you. Think of the less favored topics as “supporting bricks” for your career path.

3. Don't be afraid of competition

Stoking the fires of your competitive spirit can help you be a more diligent student and have fun while doing homework and making better achievements than anyone else in class. You can team up with one or two friends and inspire each other to do better in all subjects.

4. A reward can be motivating

Big projects can be overwhelming at times. When faced with such a brick wall, you should make a plan and divide the entire process into a few smaller steps. Take each step and turn it into a goal. Reward yourself with small treats or breaks upon reaching each step.

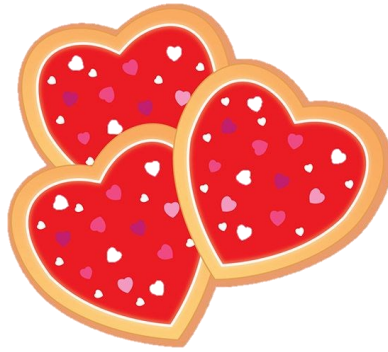

5. Get support to get motivated

Success in learning is not intended to be done alone. Generally, family is a source of support. Don't forget about your friends—especially those who are working on the same project. Studying in groups enhances your overall learning experience. Remember that your teacher is also a source of support when you choose to use it.

At Hurricane Intermediate, we want all students to achieve high levels of learning. It is my hope that these five points shared will help your student when challenges surface.
